

FICO / Damage Points

EVEN IN A MORE RESILIENT REAL ESTATE MARKET like the Great Northwest, good credit isn't just nice to have -- it's essential. Even though local employers like Boeing, Microsoft and Amazon.com have been relatively resistant and responsive to the current economic crisis, having a job isn't the only criteria for qualifying for a new home. Taking care of your credit and knowing where you stand before starting the home buying process is the best way to fix any credit issues you may find. As most people know, lower scores mean higher rates or at the very worst, possibly being turned down for a home loan. Not only can low credit scores hurt your chances of buying a home, but it is oftentimes used by insurance companies, landlords or when applying for certain jobs.

The formula that ranks your credit score is called "FICO" (Fair Isaac Company) score and is calculated by taking into account positive and negative use of your credit. FICO illustrates the five categories and what percentage is used to determine credit scores (the actual formula to determine your score is based on a well guarded secret.) A negative report from any category is called a "damage point" by FICO. What sounds like a phrase pulled from a video game, "damage points" can wreak havoc with your credit.
